

Robin Thicke and Pharrell Williams to face Marvin Gaye's family in court over Blurred Lines plagiarism claims

Updated Thu 30 Oct 2014, 11:04pm

PHOTO: Pharrell Williams and Robin Thicke will face Marvin Gaye's family in court over plagiarism claims. (Reuters: Rick Wilking)

The family of Marvin Gaye has won a round in a court battle over allegations that last year's blockbuster hit song Blurred Lines ripped off the late Motown legend's work.

RELATED STORY: Iranians arrested over Happy video sentenced to jail

MAP: United States

A US federal judge denied a motion by singer Robin Thicke and songwriter Pharrell Williams, who wanted a court to reject the plagiarism accusations made by Gaye's children.

The ruling clears the way for the dispute to head to a celebrity trial that is scheduled to open in Los Angeles in February.

The Gaye estate said Blurred Lines copied elements of the singer's 1976 track Got to Give It Up.

The two sides brought in music experts who dissected the songs' structures to debate the merits of the claim.

"Defendants have made a sufficient showing that elements of Blurred Lines may be substantially similar to protected, original elements of Got to Give It Up," Judge John Kronstadt of the US District Court for Central California said.

"Genuine issues of material fact are present as to the extrinsic similarity of the works. The intrinsic similarity of the works is a jury question," he wrote.

Blurred Lines was controversial long before it made its way to the US court.

The song contains the refrain "I hate these blurred lines/ I know you want it" and has been condemned by critics who have said the lyrics refer to the issue of sexual consent.

The video features naked women parading before Thicke.

The R&B singer had said that he was fond of Got to Give It Up when he recorded Blurred Lines.

But in court, Thicke insisted that he had embellished the connection as he liked being called the "white Marvin Gaye" and contended that Williams, who later recorded the smash hit Happy, did all the writing on Blurred Lines.

The judge said: "Thicke's inconsistent statements do not constitute direct evidence of copying."

Thicke and Williams brought to court a musicologist, Sandy Wilbur, who testified that the melody, harmony and rhythm of the songs were different.

She said that only one note in the songs' key phrases had the same pitch and placement, but did not last the same duration.

But an expert for Gaye's family, Judith Finell, pointed to eight similarities and said that Ms Wilbur erred in "microscopically analysing" each musical element in isolation.

AFP

Topics: music, pop, arts-and-entertainment, law-crime-and-justice, united-states

First posted Thu 30 Oct 2014, 10:53pm

Defendants have made a sufficient showing that elements of Blurred Lines may be substantially similar to protected, original elements of Got to Give It Up.

Judge John Kronstadt, US District Court